A regular-faced convex polyhedron is one in which all the faces are regular polygons, not necessarily with the same number of sides. Counting the prisms and anti-prisms as one type of solid each, there seem to be 112 regular-faced convex polyhedra as conjectured by Johnson and later proved by Zalgaller.

Convex polytopes are called regular faced, if all their facets are regular. It is known, that all regular faced 3-polytopes have a nontrivial symmetry group, and also all polytopes with centrally

Norman Johnson sought which convex non-uniform polyhedra had regular faces, although not necessarily all alike. In 1966, he published a list of 92 such solids, gave them names and numbers, and conjectured that there were no others.

The five convex regular polyhedra are known collectively as the Platonic solids. A proof that that there are only five is outlined below. The following table highlights some of the fundamental properties of the five Platonic solids including the face shape and the numbers of vertices, edges, and faces:
